

TWO COATS OF PAINT

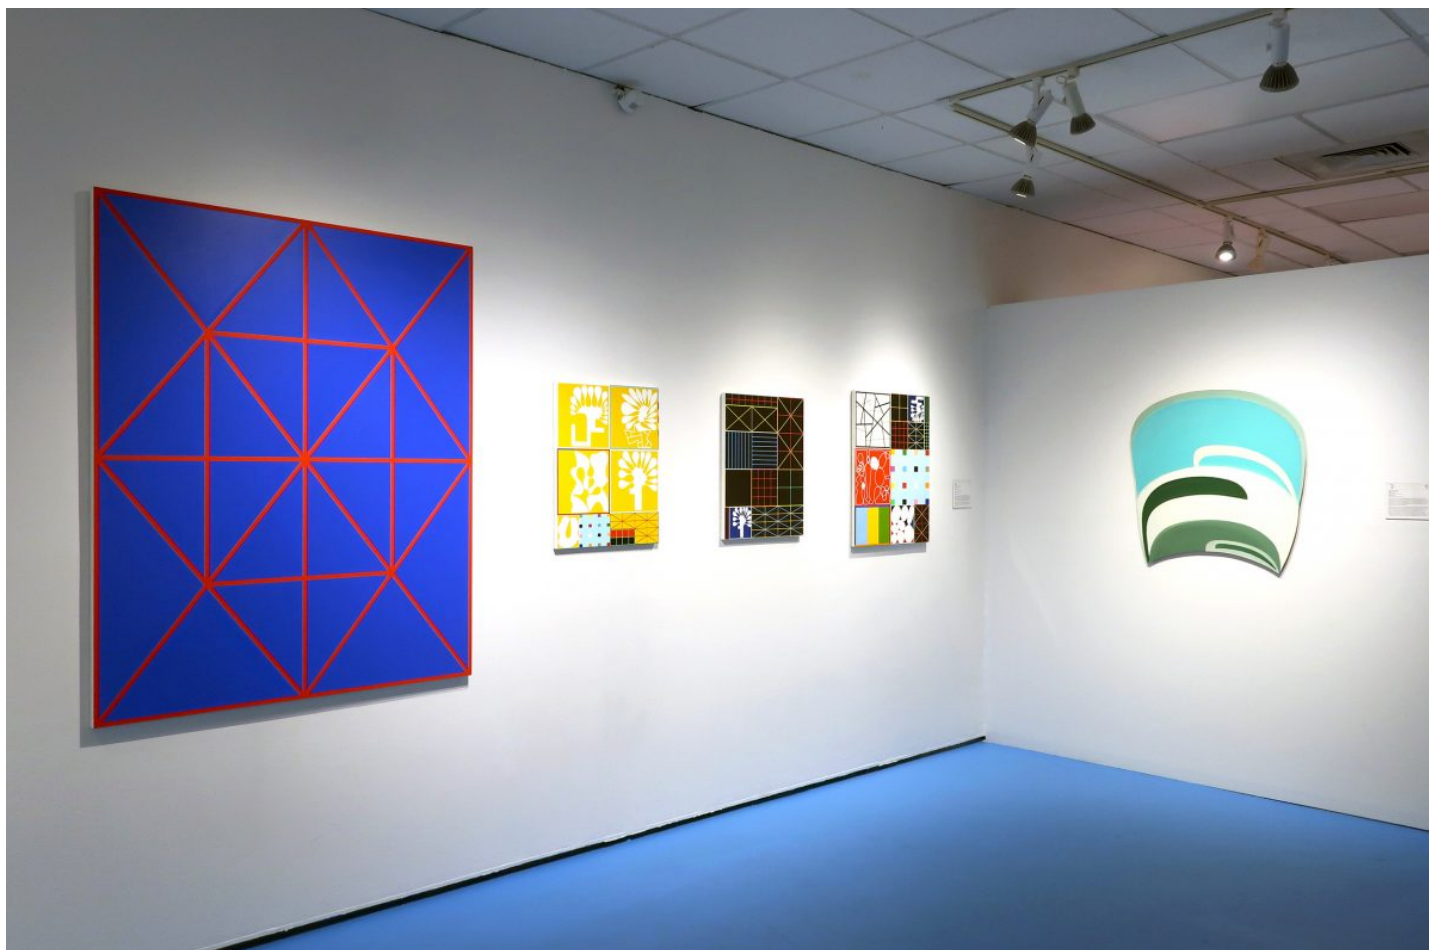

Award-winning NYC blogazine, primarily about painting

GROUP SHOWS

The Abstract Zeitgeist in Storrs

November 16, 2019 2:24 pm

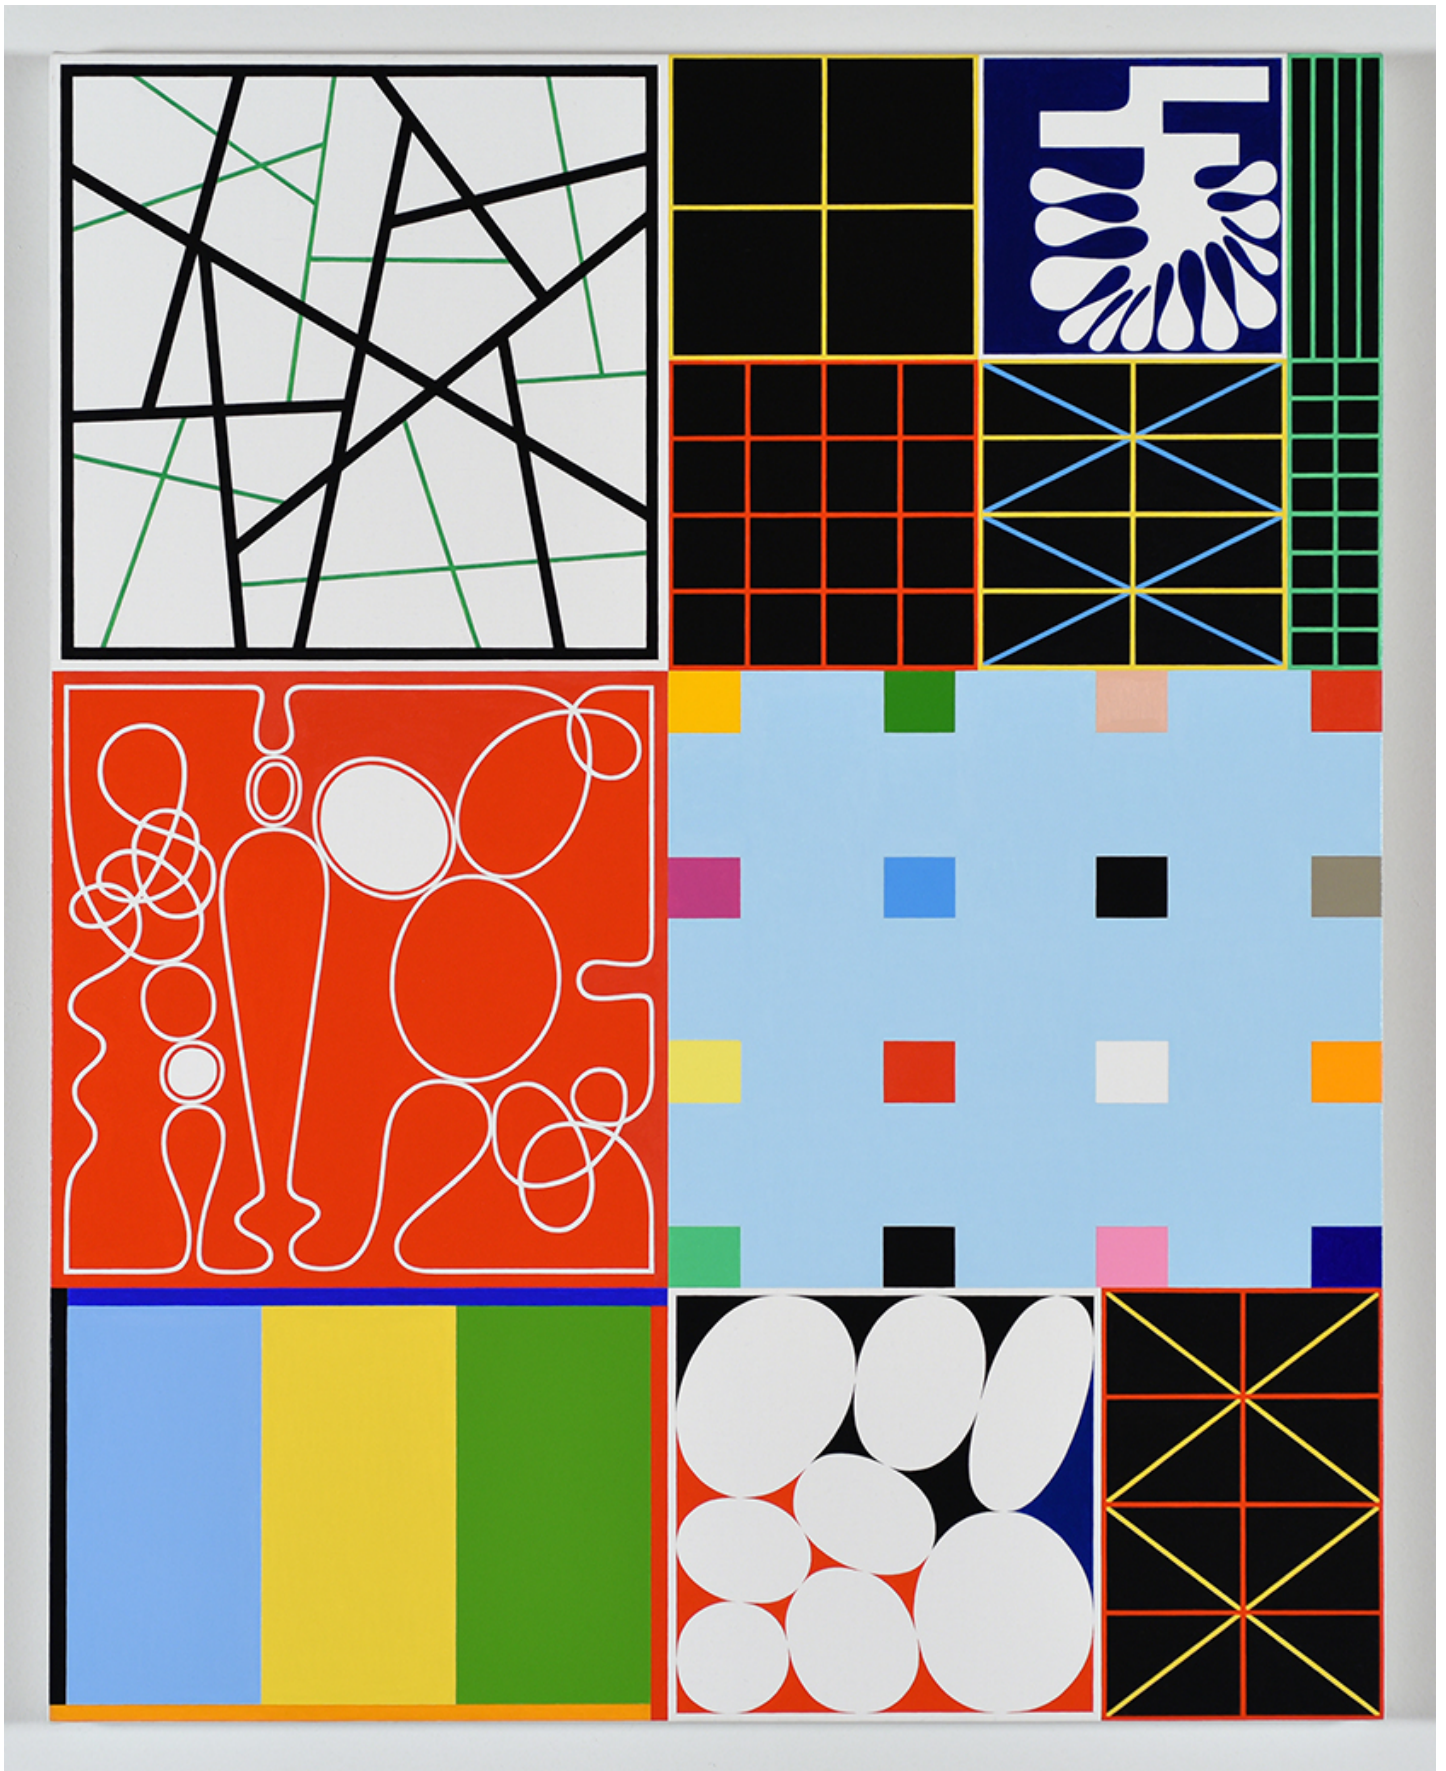

“Constructed,” installation view at the University of Connecticut’s Contemporary Art Gallery

Contributed by Stephen Maine/ On view at the University of Connecticut's Contemporary Art Galleries through November 29 is "Constructed," a lively exhibition of seventeen works by five distinguished midcareer painters whose handling of color—as a kind of visual armature—is inseparable from structure. The show's curator, Museum Director Barry Rosenberg, calls on Beverly Fishman, Marilyn Lerner, Paul Pagk, Joanna Pousette-Dart and Cary Smith for evidence that, in a rising challenge to the current fashion for figurative painting, "a counterrevolution featuring new tactics of abstraction is bubbling to the surface."

Further along in the press release, Rosenberg asserts that "today's best abstract art isn't a redo" of past movements or styles or approaches. "Rather," he writes, "this work is embedded with the personal experiences of these artists, speaks to this cultural moment, and draws inspiration from the broader history of abstract painting."

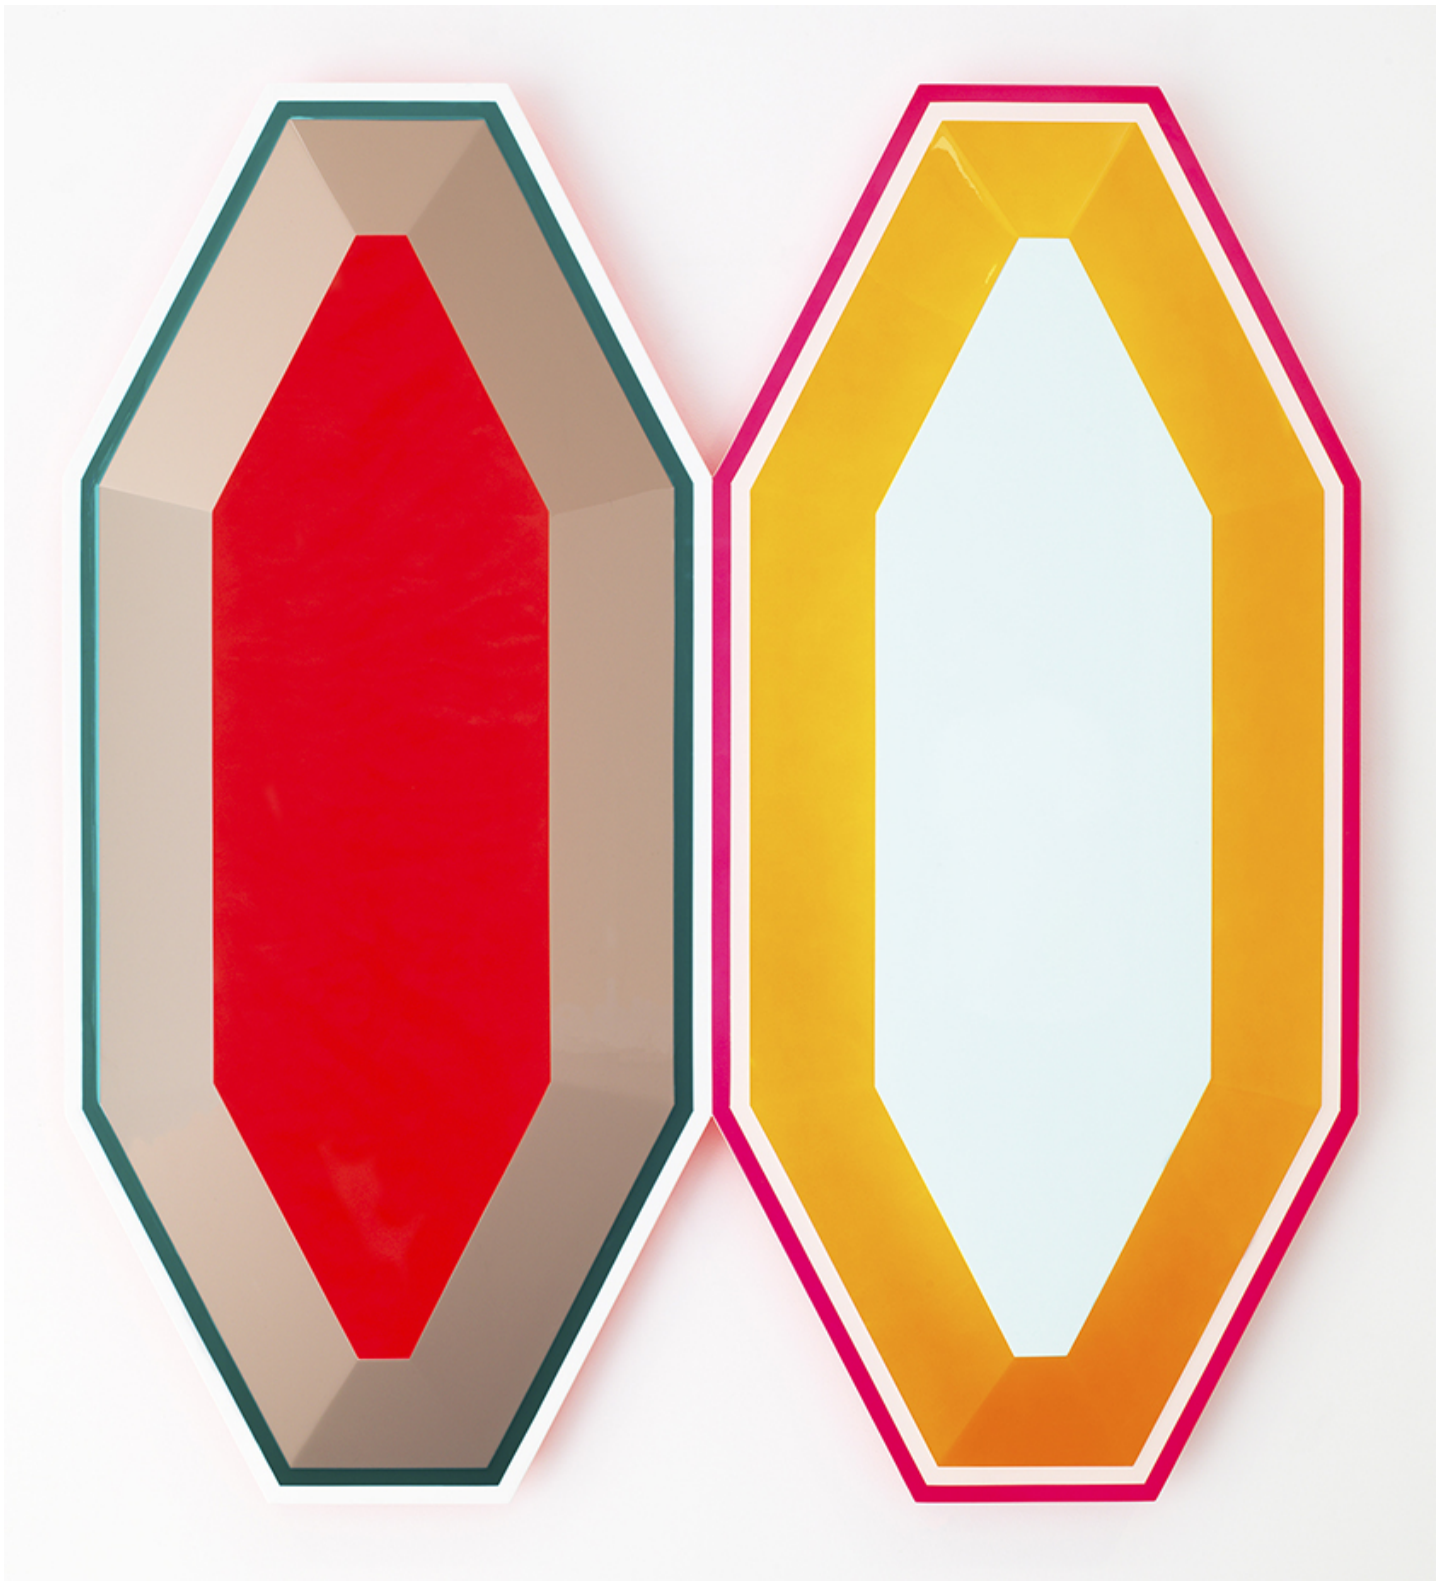

We assume that to some extent the artists' personal experiences are embedded in this work—how could it be otherwise? We also readily surmise that histories of the discipline they practice are sources of insight and motivation; there are no "outsiders" on this roster. But the remarkable claim that the work "speaks to this cultural moment" raises the question of just how it is that the rarefied idiom of geometric abstraction might do any such thing.

Cary Smith, Index Painting #12 (Treust Masor Soin), 30 x 24 inches

Cary Smith's Complex Diagonals (Blue-red) is the most plain-spoken painting in the show, and the most insistently non-referential. Hot orange-red stripes subdivide a pungent blue ground along horizontal, vertical and diagonal axes; their interaction induces dazzling afterimages. Paintings produced through reductive means run the risk of being readable at a glance, but Complex Diagonals (typical of Smith's larger paintings) avoids that fate by virtue of perceptual complexities, deadpan humor and technical finesse.

Less convincing, however, are Index Painting #12 (Treust Masor Soin) and two others from this numbered series, into which the self-quoting Smith packs, bento-box style, several miniature versions of his favored compositional schema such as contiguous, lolling ovals; branching diagonals; an airy grid of polychrome rectangles (here, against a pale blue ground); and a hyperdigitated "splat" shape. Grouping these pictorial abbreviations on a single smallish canvas heightens the sense that they are proxies for larger, more fully embodied paintings. They function as logos pointing to this artist's signature motifs. If branding is a phenomenon characteristic of our cultural moment, Smith is working it.

Beverly Fishman, Untitled, Double Pain, 38.5 x 38 inches

A design aesthetic also informs the flawless surfaces and even, luminous colors of Beverly Fishman's low reliefs, which are made with urethane paint on shaped wood panels. They derive from the artist's repertoire of symbols for mental and physical maladies (anxiety, pain, depression, asthma, digestive problems, high blood pressure) in a palette ranging from panic-disorder orange to comfortably-numb gray-green. Untitled (Sleepiness, Opioid Addiction, ADHD) consists of three such sections—a rectangle with two rounded corners, a square with one rounded corner, and a quarter-circle—joined in an asymmetrical hybrid shape that resembles an enormous pill.

Each section features slightly beveled margins that are subject to a bit of actual highlighting and shadow; several thin bands of saturated, contrasting color outline them, as if trying to cheer them up. These clinically precise, maximum-strength paintings address the subjective experience of disease with counter-intuitive formal clarity.

Joanna Pousette-Dart

Are such part-to-whole relationships emblematic of our “constructed” time? The hard, curved edges of Fishman’s paintings contrast nicely with the swelling, organic curves—more like curls—in Joanna Pousette-Dart’s, which similarly suggest a recombinative method. Thinking outside the box of painting’s default rectangularity, Pousette-Dart has long favored a format consisting of a small number of vaguely boat-like shapes, stacked one over another. Floating World has two; the upper one is physically larger but chromatically lighter—hazy and pale—and it exerts an odd kind of pressure along the edge it shares with the lower, smaller, punchier panel.

The resemblance of this painter’s work generally to some of the distinctive characteristics of Northwest Coast native American painting is striking—in particular, those ubiquitous curling, pointed, bird-beak contours and longitudinally truncated ovals—but she’s stated that she’s not consciously appropriating, that she arrived at these motifs organically. Becoming aware of Northwest Coast art at an early age undoubtedly influenced her authentic sensibility (“personal experiences”—check), and anyway I’m more interested in the degree of visual autonomy of the painting’s top and bottom sections. Pousette-Dart’s take on modularity is different from Fishman’s; the individuation of each panel is checked by form-fitting brushstrokes that echo their edges. They feel stretched and smoothed as if the painting were a pillow, and gently tucked in at the corners.

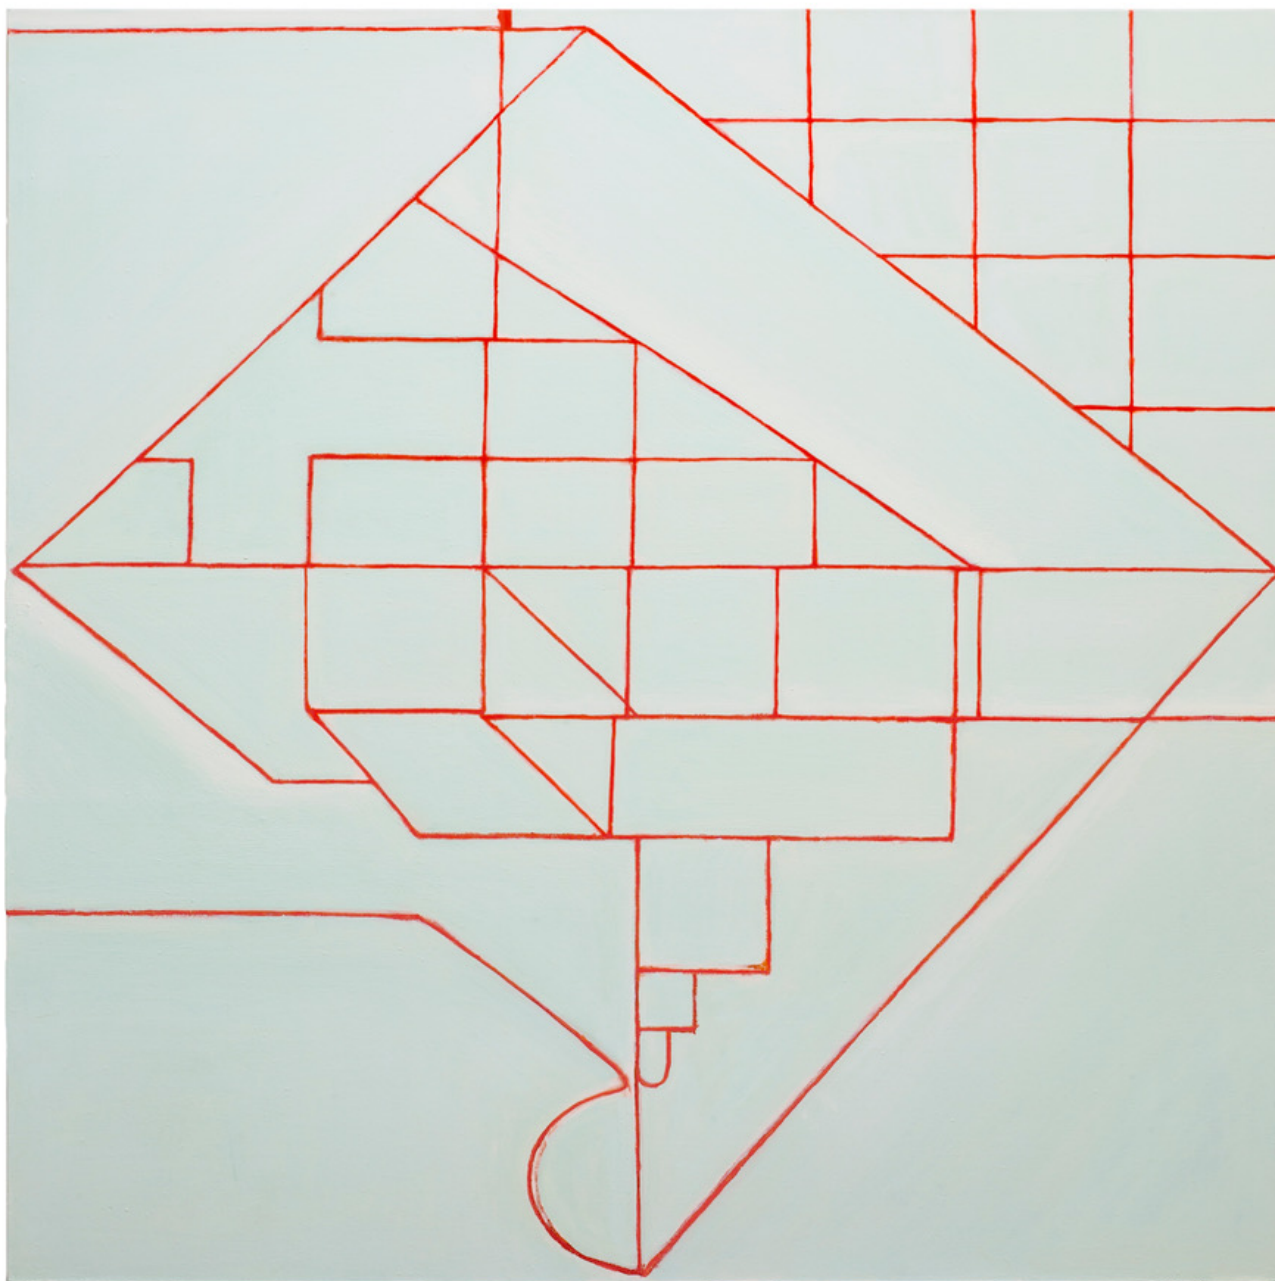

Marilyn Lerner, The Nature of Sisters, 36 x 36 inches

Expressions of cultural momentousness in Marilyn Lerner's paintings emerge from their musicality and are in synch with the contemporary interest in interdisciplinarity. In The Nature of Sisters, a contrapuntal grid as complex as a fugue mirrors itself in a disco ball; Inside Outside strikes a beautifully somber chord of three inflected grays (purplish, greenish, and brownish ovals) against an inky ground; capriccio color notes embellish a droning midsection in Black Center.

The outlier among Lerner's paintings is the circular, three-foot-wide African Violet. Angled notches on the left and right imply a spinning motion ($33\frac{1}{3}$ rpm?) and the bebop palette—warm/cool, light/dark—is rooted in semi-neutralized secondary colors but breaks into squeaky sequences of saturated color that outline a central pair of vertical ovals.

Paul Pagk, Untitled, 70 x 70 inches

A scaffolding of thin, slate-blue lines suggesting flattened cages or fire escapes or a game board gone slightly haywire subdivides the uniform, pale pink ground of Paul Pagk's imposing La vie en rose/in the flesh. Fine-tuned horizontals, verticals, diagonals and semicircles compartmentalize the canvas, yielding scores of contiguous zones or territories.

Subtle though it is, a nonconforming stripe is the main event. This daring brushstroke—in a pink barely paler than the ground—breaks free, races across the painting, hangs a hard right and angles downward toward an eccentric teardrop shape dangling like a carrot.

Paul Pagk and Johanna Pousette-Dart

Two exquisite drawings suggest the origins of Pagk's board game/cage images (there is a second painting, equally commanding) might be in an exploration of linear perspective and/or axonometric drawings. The inclusion of these small framed works varies the visual rhythm of the installation, which includes primarily mid-size paintings. The exhibition is visually dense and tests the compact confines of the gallery. Such crowding could be intentional, I suppose, a curatorial gesture alluding to the visual overload that cultural commentators often cite as a characteristic of contemporary life.

And really, if you're fomenting a "counterrevolution," you'd better bring plenty of ammunition.

"Constructed: Beverly Fishman, Marilyn Lerner, Paul Pagk, Joanna Pousette-Dart, and Cary Smith," Contemporary Art Galleries, University of Connecticut, Storrs, CT. Through

About the author: Stephen Maine is a painter who lives and works in West Cornwall, Connecticut. His writing has appeared regularly in Hyperallergic, Art in America, ARTnews, Art on Paper, The New York Sun, Artillery, Artcritical.com, and Artnet.com Magazine.

NOTE: Today is the SEVENTEENTH day of the 2019 Two Coats of Paint year-end fundraising campaign and we are on our way to making our goal. If you value what we do at Two Coats of Paint, please consider supporting us for another year. Thanks in advance for your tax-deductible contributions and heartfelt thanks to those readers who have already contributed. Please click here to contribute.

Related posts:

Invitation: Houses in Motion, a tectonic tremor

Geometric Abstraction update in DC

Roundup: Abstraction in Connecticut

Tags: Barry Rosenberg, Contemporary Art Galleries, geometric abstraction, Stephen Maine

2 Comments

Billy Evans

November 18, 2019 at 8:47 am

The author takes his cue from the curator's art-speak blurb and plays along with some necessary playful jabs. It quite often is a chore if one reads art-speak blurbs first to then have one's viewing half filled with, "where is that counterrevolution thing the curator was asserting?"

One is always tempted to ask the individual arts if they in fact are 'counterrevolutioning'.

From the photos it looks like a handsome show.

Within this review of the counterrevolution there is a battle of the semi colon usurping land from the comma. And a couple of words have been so frightened they are hugging and there is no space between them, reported the grammar scout just back from the front lines.

M.K. Hughes

December 17, 2019 at 9:18 am

The appeal of abstract art, at least in my opinion, is the fact that it allows for interpretation and discussion on a level deeper than art in which the subject matter and purpose is straight forward. There are tons of different ways to take this type of work.

Leave a Comment

Your email address will not be published. Required fields are marked *

Message

Name

 *

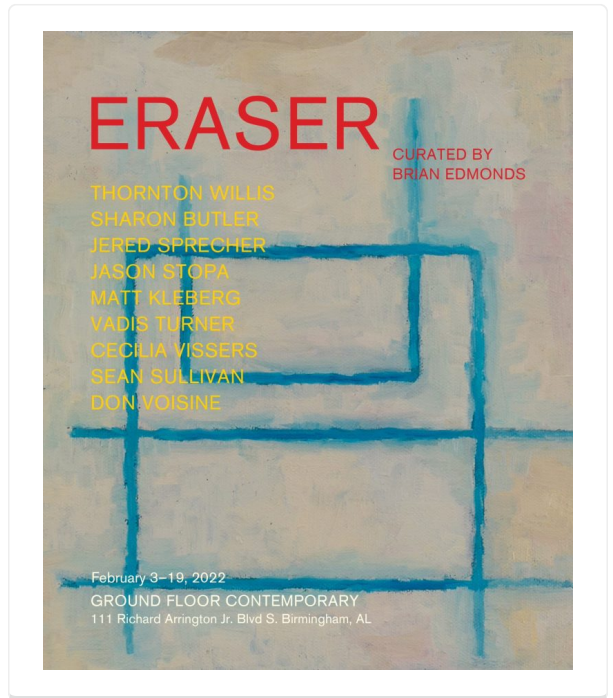

Email Address

 *

Website

Save my name, email, and website in this browser for the next time I comment.

Post Comment

The logo for Two Coats of Paint Social Media Services. It features the text "TWO COATS OF PAINT" in white, "SOCIAL MEDIA" in red, and "SERVICES" in white, all on a black background.

Follow us

Archives

Select Month

Popular

Two Coats Selected Gallery Guide: February 2022

Contributed by Sharon Butler / What's up February? I'm looking forward to stopping by Ortega y Gasset in Gowanus to see "Surface Tension," a group show featuring work by Dexter ...

Mark Ryan Chariker's Romantic No-Man's-Lands

Contributed by Patrick Neal / Mark Ryan Chariker's

paintings have a romantic, brooding quality that sometimes leans toward the Gothic. In All the Time in the World, his second solo ...

Art and TV: Professor T, an extraordinary burst of mind Contributed by Laurie Fendrich / Boy did the otherwise on-the-mark Guardian television critic Lucy Mangan get it wrong. In her 2017 review of the Flemish detective series Professor T, ...

Wayne Thiebaud and starting over Contributed by Laurie Fendrich / The California painter Wayne Thiebaud died on Christmas Day. He was renowned, first and foremost, for his paintings of candies, cakes, and pies, which he ...

History: Artist-run galleries in NYC in the 1950s and 1960s

At artist-run galleries, the conversation centers on art rather than commerce. Alternative spaces provide a place for unknown and under-recognized artists to mount exhibitions, for curators to organize their first thematic shows, and for established artists ...

Vincent Smith's powerful ether Contributed by

Jonathan Stevenson / When the Minimalists were casting paintings as nothing more than value-free objects in the world and the Pop Artists were knocking them off their elitist ...

Two Coats Selected Gallery Guide: January 2022

Contributed by Sharon Butler / If January feels dreary, cheer up. Take a look at this long, interesting list of exhibitions that are opening in NYC.

Seriously, what are Carroll Dunham's paintings about?

December 5, 2012 / A couple years ago in the LA Times, art critic David Pagel wrote that Carroll Dunham's paintings of women were

"vulgar beyond belief...offensive,
demeaning and disgusting ...

Michael Krebber: The poetry in painting? Contributed by Sharon Butler / Like Michael
Krebber, I love beginnings

and find meaning in irresoluteness. Lately, though, in my own work and that of other painters, I have come ...

Jennifer Coates and the landscape's afterglow

Contributed by James J. A.
Mercer / Mythological

characters and creatures from antiquity
populate Jennifer Coates's beguiling solo show "Lesser Gods of Lakewood, PA" at High Noon Gallery on the ...

Get Two Coats via email

Subscribe!

Email

Name

- Monthly newsletter
- Weekly
- As posts are published

Archives

Select Month

NEWSroll

UNESCO Report Warns of 'Unprecedented Crisis in the Cultural Sector'

Source: ArtNews News | Published on 02-08-22
| By Tessa Solomon

Where to see 10 artists of Frieze around L.A. — ahead of the art fair

Source: LA Times Arts | Published on 02-08-22

Super Bowl halftime dancers' $15-an-hour contract is 'a disappointment,' advocates say

Source: LA Times Arts | Published on 02-08-22

Tate to Strip Sackler Name from Multiple Locations

Source: ArtForum News | Published on 02-08-22

Pace Gallery Taps Kimberly Drew as Associate Director

Source: ArtForum News | Published on 02-08-22

For the full Two Coats NEWSroll, click here.

Home Contact About Advertising Support Subscribe NEWSroll Two Coats Conversations

Copyright © 2021 Two Coats of Paint / Designed by WPZOOM